These digestive juices break down the food particles in the chyme into glucose, triglycerides, and amino acids. Some chemical digestion of food takes place in the duodenum. Absorption of fatty acids also takes place in the duodenum. The second part of the small intestine is called the jejunum, shown in Figure 3. Here, hydrolysis of nutrients is continued while most of the carbohydrates and amino acids are absorbed through the intestinal lining.

When there is no structural problem like severe arthritis, degenerative joint disease, or a bulgeing disk, lower back pain may be coming from digestive stress. Kidney stress from poor digestion, and large bowel stress from constipation, diarrhea or irritable bowel syndrome are often causes of lower back pain. Hence, lower back pain and digestive problems often go together.
