Life-span development studies human development from the moment of conception to the last breath. The goal is not to describe characteristics of any particular time period but to trace and predict the processes of "dynamic interaction"—how the present connects to a person's past and future.

Life-Span Development - Psychology - Oxford Bibliographies

The life span perspective of the human development is based on the idea that a person moves through several stages of development during the whole life (Berger, 2011, p. 7). Thus, certain changes are typical for the definite stages of life, but it is also important to pay attention to the individual character of experienced changes because all the people are different.

Evolutionary theory has recently been applied to life-span development. It contends that contemporary humans have inherited genetic tendencies that fostered survival and reproduction of the human species a million years ago. Some hypotheses from this theory are particularly provocative, such as the explanation for male-female differences in romantic liaisons.
